“ Alan was a one of a kind! He was the only person I have ever known to really tear into me for labeling a warranty call wrong, but immediately put that behind us and be the first one to ask me about how my wife and baby girl were anytime we seen each other. I still talk about him anytime I get the chance saying, “Alan Stanhope is a wizard when it comes to HVAC”.

There are no words....my parents and Alan's parents were close friends for decades, so I grew up around his family. He played music with my father and Fay in Fay's band. I've admired his talent for decades. I've had the privilege of playing music with Alan myself. There is an old saying..." Lions don't need to roar." In many ways, Alan was the Lion. He didn't roar...he didn't have to! He was so talented in his his music, such an expert in his job, very much a family man....that these characteristics made him stand out & people were just naturally attracted to him, but yet he was very humble in all these things. Overall, he was a quiet man. He never said a whole lot. You had to really know him before he opened up. He never tooted his own horn. He would flash that wonderful smile when he got a kick out of something or was pleased, but usually he was looking down or off to the side when he did it...that was just his way...humble. People say the Good die young, and he is gone, so it must be true. So many hearts grieving by his leaving...mine among them. Go rest high on that mountain, my friend. I hope your spirit soars. You will not be forgotten.
